London, Friday, Oct. 26 -- Doubts about the reliability of the American photographs of the Soviet military build-up in Cuba were expressed today in the Times of London.

Alun Gwynne-Jones, military correspondent of the Times, in an article said that although the British government was completely convinced of the authenticity of the pictures, there were some doubts about the American interpretation of them.

For instance, the writer declared, the Ilyushin-28 bomber, which the United States says is being supplied to Cuban forces, can not be considered an offensive weapon.

He noted that the guided missiles positively identified in the photographs were surface-to-air and therefore primarily defensive. But, he said, experts had no doubts that the missile sites were designed for offensive purposes.
